The Geisel School of Medicine at Dartmouth, Dartmouth Psychiatric Research Center

Joanne Nicholson, Ph.D. has been a clinical and research psychologist for over 30 years, and is currently Professor of Psychiatry at the Dartmouth Psychiatric Research Center of the Geisel School of Medicine. Dr. Nicholson has established an active program of research on parents with mental illnesses and their children, in partnership with people in recovery. She is the lead author of Parenting Well When You're Depressed and Creating Options for Family Recovery, and is a co-editor of Parental Psychiatric Disorder, 3rd ed. Dr. Nicholson has published more than 100 publications and has been investigator on over 50 research grants and contracts. She has received funding from numerous federal agencies, private foundations, and industry sources.

In 2006, Dr. Nicholson received the Armin Loeb Award from the U.S. Psychiatric Rehabilitation Association for her significant career contribution to research. She has been a W.T. Grant Foundation Distinguished Fellow and a NIDRR Switzer Distinguished Research Fellow. She is the 2010 recipient of the University of Massachusetts Medical School Women's Faculty Committee Outstanding Community Service Award, the 2011 recipient of the Katharine F. Erskine Award for Women in Medicine and Science, and in 2012 was named a Fellow of the Gender Research Institute at Dartmouth.

Dr. Nicholson has provided hundreds of presentations and consulted to government agencies, human service agencies and advocacy groups in the US and internationally on mental health, parenting, recovery and, most recently, the development of technology-based tools and resources for individuals living with serious mental illnesses.
